

Secret Seven Win Through

Enid Blyton

Conversion of WMF images is not supported

---

Use Microsoft Word or OpenOffice to save this RTF file as HTML and convert that in calibre.

calibre 0.8.20

Secret Seven Win Through

Enid Blyton

graph-definition>

Secret
Seven
Win
Through Enid
Blyton

Secret Seven Win Through Enid Blyton

THE
SEVENTH
ADVENTURE
OF THE
SECRET
SEVEN

graph-definition>

S S

stands for the Secret Seven

When they lost their usual meeting place and had to find another,
Peter, Janet and the rest of the gang stumbled on a mystery actually inside it!

BROCKHAMPTON PRESS

*7/6 net
in U.K.*

Enid Blyton

For many years now
she has been Britain's best-loved and most popular children's author.

The wife of a distinguished
London surgeon,
she has two daughters of her own,
Gillian and Imogen.

They were her earliest critics and most ardent fans.

Wide and deep in her reading and a very fine naturalist,
she is interested in science, philosophy and people.

In character,
Enid Blyton is like
her books: lively,
witty, kind,
generous and very approachable.

THE SECRET SEVEN
WIN THROUGH

Enid Blyton

---

Secret seven win through

THIS BOOK BELONGS TO

_____

_____

_____

Enid Blyton

SECRET SEVEN WIN THROUGH

Illustrated by Bruno Kay

BROCKHAMPTON PRESS

---

CONTENTS

---

CHAPTER	PAGE
1 The Holidays Begin	9
2 A Dreadful Blow	14
3 Plenty of Ideas	26
4 In the Cave	33
5 Settling In	40
6 Jack is Very Puzzled	46
7 A Real Mystery	53
8 Scamper is a Help	62
9 An Exciting Plan	70
10 What Happened at Half Past Eight	75
11 Off They Go Again!	81
12 The Scarecrow Inn	87
13 Everything Seems Dull Now	98
14 What an Excitement!	104
15 A Wonderful Finish!	111

CHAPTER ONE

The Holidays Begin

'EASTER holidays at last!' said Peter. 'I thought they were never coming. Didn't you, Janet?'

'Yes. It was a frightfully long term,' said Janet. 'We've broken up now though, thank goodness. Don't you love the first day of the hols, Peter?'

---

'Rather! I get a lovely free sort of feeling,' said Peter, 'and the hols seem to stretch out in front of me for ages and ages. Let's have some fun, Janet!'

'Yes, let's! April's a lovely month—it's warm, and sunny too, and Mummy will let us off to picnics any day we like,' said Janet. 'Scamper, do you hear that? Picnics, I said—and that means rabbit-hunting for you, and long, long walks.'

'Woof!' said Scamper at once, his tail thumping on the floor, and his eyes bright.

'You're the best and finest golden spaniel in the whole world!' said Janet, stroking his silky head. *And I do so love your long, droopy ears, Scamper. You like it when we have holidays, don't you?'

'Woof!' said Scamper again, and thump-thump-thump went his tail.

'I vote we have a meeting of the Secret Seven as soon as ever we can,' said Peter. 'To-morrow, if possible. Picnics and things are much more fun if we all go together.'

'Yes. Let's have a meeting,' said Janet. 'What with exams and one thing and another all the Secret Seven have forgotten about the Society. I haven't thought a word about it for at least three weeks. Golly—what's the password?'

'Oh, Janet—you haven't forgotten that surely T said Peter.

'You tell me,' said Janet, but Peter wouldn't. 'You don't know it yourself!' said Janet. 'I bet you don't!'

'Don't be silly,' said Peter. 'You'll have to remember it by to-morrow, if we have a meeting. Where's your badge? I expect you've lost that.'

'I have not,' said Janet. 'But I bet some of the others will have lost theirs. Somebody always does when we don't have a meeting for some time.'

'Better write out short notes to the other five,' said Peter. 'And tell them to come along to-morrow. Got some note-paper, Janet?'

'Yes, I have. But I don't feel a bit like sitting down and writing the first day of the hols,' said Janet. 'You can jolly well help to write them.'

'No. I'll bike round to all the others and deliver the notes for you,' said Peter.

'Now it's you who are silly,' said Janet. 'If you're going to everyone's house, why not tell them about the meeting. All this note-writing! You just tell them.'

'All right. It just seems more official if we send out notes for a meeting that's all,' said Peter. 'What time shall we have it?'

'Oh—half past ten, I should think,' said Janet. 'And just warn Jack that he's not to let his horrible sister Susie know, or she'll come banging at the door, shouting out some silly password at the top of her voice.'

'Yes. I'll tell him,' said Peter. 'The worst of it is, Susie is so jolly sharp—she always seems to smell out anything to do with the Secret Seven.'

'She would be a better person to have in a club than out of it,' said Janet. 'But we'll never, never let her into ours.'

'Never,' said Peter. 'Anyway, we can't be more than seven, or we wouldn't be the Secret Seven.'

'Woof!' said Scamper.

'He says he belongs, even if we're seven and he makes the eighth!' said Janet. 'You're just a hanger-on, Scamper, but we simply couldn't do without you.'

'Well—I'm going to get my bike,' said Peter, getting up. 'I'll go round and tell all the others. See you later, Janet. Coming, Scamper?'

Off he went, and was soon bicycling to one house after another. He went to Colin first, who was delighted to hear the news.

---

'Goodo!' he said. 'Half past ten? Right, I'll be there. I say—whatever's the password, Peter?'

'You've got all day to think of it!' said Peter, with a grin, and rode off to Jack's. Jack was in the garden, mending a puncture in the back wheel of his bicycle. He was very pleased to see Peter.

'Meeting of the Secret Seven to-morrow morning in the shed at the bottom of our garden,' said Peter. 'I hope you've got your badge, and that your awful sister Susie hasn't found it and taken it.'

'I've got it on,' said Jack, with a grin. 'And I wear it on my pyjamas at night, so it's always safe to say, Peter—what's the password?'

'I can tell you!' said a voice from up a near-by tree. The boys looked up to see Susie's laughing face looking down at them.

'You don't know it!' said Jack fiercely.

'I do, I do!' said the annoying Susie. 'But I shan't tell you, and you won't be allowed in at the meeting. What a joke!'

Peter rode off to the rest of the Seven. That Susie! She really was the most AGGRAVATING girl in the whole world!

CHAPTER TWO

A Dreadful Blow

NEXT morning Peter and Janet began preparing for the meeting. Meetings weren't proper meetings, somehow, unless there was plenty to eat and drink while they talked. Their mother was always generous in giving cakes or biscuits, and lemonade, and the two children went to find her.

'She's out,' said the cook, looking up from chopping parsley on a board. 'She told me to tell you she would be back presently. You were at the bottom of the garden, and didn't hear her calling you.'

'Oh, blow!' said Peter. 'We're going to have a Secret Seven meeting, and we wanted something to eat and drink.'

'Well now, let me see—you can have that tin of ginger biscuits—they've gone soft,' said Cookie, smiling. 'And you can make yourself some real lemonade—there are plenty of lemons and sugar in the larder.'

'Ooh good!' said Janet. 'I'll do that. I'll make it with hot water, and let it go cool. Anything else we can have?'

'Jam-tarts,' said Cookie, chopping away hard at the parsley. 'Only four though, I'm afraid. That's all that were left from supper last night.'

'Four—well, we'll halve them,' said Peter. 'There'll be one half over, so ...'

'Woof! woof!' said Scamper, at once. The children laughed.

'All right—you shall have the half left over,' said Peter. 'You never miss a word of what we say, do you, Scamper?'

Janet made the lemonade, and Peter got the tin of biscuits and found the tarts. He cut them carefully into exact halves and put them on a plate.

'Come on, Janet,' he said. 'It's nearly half past ten.'

'Peter—please do tell me the password!' said Janet. 'I'm very, very sorry I've forgotten it.'

'No. I shan't tell you,' said Peter. 'You'll have to be in the shed, anyhow, and you can jolly well listen to the others coming along and saying the password, and feel ashamed of yourself.'

'You're mean!' said Janet. 'Isn't he mean, Scamper?'

Scamper didn't answer. 'There,' said Peter, 'he won't say I'm mean. He never will. Do come on, Janet. I'm not going to wait a minute longer.'

Janet was ready. She put the jug of lemonade and seven unbreakable mugs on an old tray and followed Peter out of the kitchen. 'Thanks very much for your help, Cookie!' she said, as she went carefully down the steps outside the kitchen door.

Peter was ahead of her. He went along the path that wound between the bushes right down to the bottom of the garden, where the old shed stood that they used for their meetings. On the door was always pinned the sign 'S.S.' How many, many times the Secret Seven had met there and made exciting plans!

Janet followed a little way behind, carrying her tray carefully. She suddenly heard Peter give a startled shout, and almost dropped the tray she held.

'What's the matter?' she called, and tried to hurry. She came in sight of the shed—and stared in horror.

The door was wide open, and so were the windows. Everything had been turned out of the shed. There were boxes and cushions and sacks, all strewn on the ground in untidy heaps! Whatever had happened?

Janet put her tray down, afraid that she might drop it in her dismay. She looked at Peter in despair.

'Who's done this? Just as we were going to have a meeting too! It's too bad.'

Peter looked into the shed. It was quite empty, except for the shelves that ran round the sides. He was puzzled.

'Janet—it couldn't be Susie, could it?' he said. 'I mean—this is an awful thing to do—throw everything out of our shed. I don't think even Susie would do that.'

'She might,' said Janet, almost in tears. 'Oh, our lovely meeting-place!'

'Here come the others,' said Peter, as Pamela and Barbara appeared down the path together. They stared in amazement at the untidy mess on the ground.

'What's happened?' said Barbara. 'Are we too early?'

'No. We've only just seen all this ourselves,' said Peter. 'Hallo—here's Jack. Jack, look here.'

'My word!' said Jack. 'Who's done this? It can't be Susie. She's been with me all morning till left just now.'

Colin and George came up just then, and the seven looked ruefully at the boxes and cushions thrown out so untidily. 'We'd better put them back,' said Janet. 'And we'll jolly well find out who done all this to our secret meeting-place.'

They began to put everything back—and then they heard footsteps coming along down the path. Who was it? Peter looked to see.

It was the gardener, carrying a strong broom over his shoulder, a pail of water in his hand, and some cloths hanging on the side of the pail. He stared at the seven in annoyance.

'Hey, you! What are you doing? I've only just thrown all that rubbish out!'

'But why?' demanded Peter, indignantly. 'This shed is our meeting-place—and this isn't rubbish! We use it.'

'Oh, well, I don't know anything about that,' said the gardener. 'All I know is that your father told me to clear out this place, burn all the rubbish, and do a spot of painting—he said it was going to rack and ruin, and he wanted it cleaned up.'

'I see,' said Peter, his heart sinking. If his father had planned this, there was nothing to be done. He turned to the others. 'Come on—let's find somewhere to talk,' he said. 'We can't meet in our shed for while, that's certain. What a blow!'

'Never mind! We'll think of somewhere just as good,' said Colin. But nobody agreed with him. They thought the shed was the finest place in the world for Secret Seven meetings!

The Seven, followed by Scamper with his tail well down, went slowly up the garden path. Somehow it seemed dreadful not to have their usual meeting-place.

---

'We'll go to the summer-house,' said Peter. 'Oh, look, there's Mummy, Janet. We'll ask her about the shed.'

'Mummy!' called Janet. 'Why didn't you tell us the shed was going to be cleaned and painted—our own shed, I mean, where we meet? I do think somebody might have told us.'

'Oh dear—I quite forgot to tell you that Daddy wanted it cleaned and mended,' said Mummy. 'It was almost falling to bits here and there, you know. But you can have it for your meeting-place again when it's finished. It will look nice and bright and clean then.'

'But we liked it old and dark and untidy,' said Peter mournfully. 'And I do think it's a pity to have it done in the holidays, Mummy, just when we want to use it.'

'Yes—I agree that that's a pity,' said Mummy, looking very sorry. 'I would have stopped it if I'd known that it was to be done just now. Well—you'll have to find another meeting-place. What about the attic?'

'Oh no,' said Janet. 'It's no fun meeting in a house, Mummy—with other people in near-by rooms—we want a secret, lonely place, we want a really.'

'Yes.... I suppose you do,' said Mummy. 'Well, I can't suggest one, I'm afraid. Go to the summer-house just for now.'

'We were going to,' said Peter, still very doleful. Soon they were all squashed into the little old summer-house. The girls didn't much like it, because it was rather earwiggy.

They began to eat the ginger biscuits. 'Rather soft, I'm afraid,' said Janet.

'Oh, I like them soft and squidgy,' said Pam. 'I hate them when you have to bite so hard that you get a splinter in your mouth! I say—this is good lemonade! Did your mother make it, Janet?'

'No. I made it myself,' said Janet proudly. 'Peter, hadn't we better talk about where to have a new meeting-place?'

'Yes,' said Peter. 'And I vote that we all of us have a good hunt round to find somewhere—some absolutely secret place that even Jack's sister Susie won't find. It mustn't be too far away. I'll give you a week to-day to find one. Meet here this evening, in this summer-house again, at six o'clock.'

'Right,' said Colin. 'I think I know of one already.'

'Well, don't tell us now,' said Peter. 'We'll each give in our ideas this evening and put it to the vote to see which is the best. We must do these things properly.'

'Yes,' said everyone, and took a drink of Janet's lemonade.

'What about the password?' said Jack. 'We were all so upset about the shed that we never even gave the password.'

'We've all got our badges on,' said Pamela. 'I had an awful hunt for mine. I put it in such a safe place that it was almost too safe for me to find!'

'Where was it?' asked George.

'I buried it in the pot of maidenhair fern my mother has in the drawing-room,' said Pam, with a giggle. 'And then forgot about it. It took me ages to remember it.'

'I thought it looked a bit grubby,' said Peter. 'I think that's a silly place.'

'Oh, I wrapped it in paper,' said Pam. 'But I forgot that Mummy watered it twice a week—so, of course, the paper soaked off and made my badge messy.'

'It's a good thing it didn't put out roots and grow!' said Peter. Everyone laughed.

'Peter, could we have a new password?' said Jack.

'Susie knows our last one. I'm most frightfully sorry, and I don't know how she knew it, unless she hung round our last meeting and heard it.'

'All right. We'll choose a new one,' said Peter. 'It's time we did, anyway. I must say that your sister Susie is getting worse and worse, Jack. I hope she's nowhere about just now.'

Jack got up and went out of the summer-house.

~~'Nobody's anywhere near,' he said. 'Quick—what's the new password?'~~

'Easter-egg,' said Peter. 'That's easy to remember, because it's the Easter holidays.'

'Easter-egg,' repeated everyone, in low voices. Pam took out a note-book and began to write down.

'Don't you write it down, Jack!' said Janet, 'or Susie will find it. I wonder how she knew our last password.'

'Well, she called out, "Your password is Sugar-mouse" just as I was leaving,' said Jack. 'And don't mind owning up now that I was jolly glad to hear it, because I'd forgotten it completely.'

'Sugar-mouse!' said Peter, in astonishment. 'It was nothing of the sort. Susie just made that up because she knew you'd forgotten it. She hoped you would rap on the door of the shed and yell out "Sugar-mouse" and make an ass of yourself.'

Jack went red. 'What was the password then?' he said. 'Janet, you tell me. Peter won't.'

Janet went red too. 'I've forgotten it as well,' she said.

Pam blushed as red as Janet, so Peter knew she had forgotten too! He rapped on the summer house table.

'The last password was a very simple one,' he said. 'It was "Thursday". Just that, "Thursday".'

'Golly, so it was,' said Barbara. 'I just couldn't remember if it was "Thursday" or "Friday".'

'I thought it was Sunday,' said Colin, with a laugh. 'It was a silly password to choose, Peter, too easy to muddle up with the other days of the week. "Easter-egg" is much better.'

'Well, let's hope that Barbara and Colin don't mix it up with "Christmas Present" or "Birthday Gift"!' said Peter. 'Now—we've eaten everything, and Scamper's had his half-tart, and we've drunk all the lemonade—what about separating and hunting for a new meeting-place?'

'Right,' said everyone and got up. They all went off up the path to the front gate, and most of them were murmuring two words to themselves as they went.

'Easter-egg! Easter-egg! I must remember Easter-egg!'

Plenty of Ideas

AT six o'clock that evening there was a continual noise of footsteps up the path to the little summer-house. Janet, Peter, and Scamper were inside, waiting.

'Easter-egg,' said Jack, walking inside. There was no door, for the summer-house was three-sided, with its fourth side open to the garden.

'Easter-egg,' said Barbara, walking in, too.

'Where's your badge?' asked Peter sharply.

'Oh—I've got it, it's all right,' said Barbara, feeling in her pocket. 'I don't know why I forgot to pin it on.' She pinned it on carefully and sat down.

The other three came along, each solemnly giving the password.

'For once in a way nobody yelled it out,' said Peter. He took a note-book out of his pocket, and licked his pencil. 'Now then—I want your reports on any likely place to meet secretly. Colin, you begin.'

'Well—there's a fine big tree at the bottom of our garden,' began Colin hopefully. 'It's a great chestnut, and ...'

'No good, I'm afraid,' said Peter, 'but I'll put it down. It would hardly be a secret meeting-place. Everyone would see us going down the garden to it, and people passing the wall near-by would hear us up there. Barbara, what's your idea?'

'Oh, it's a silly one,' said Barbara. 'There's an old hut in a field near-by our house, and ...'

'I know it,' said Peter, scribbling in his note-book. 'Not a bad idea, Barbara. You, Pam?'

'I simply haven't any idea at all,' said Pam. 'I've thought and thought, but it's no use.'

'Not very helpful,' said Peter, putting a cross against Pam's name in his note-book. 'You, George?'

'Well, there's an empty caravan in a field not far from here,' said George. 'I know who owns it—it's a friend of my father's. I think I could get permission for us to use it.'

This sounded exciting. Everyone looked admiringly at George, who seemed quite pleased with himself.

'You, Jack?' said Peter. 'And don't suggest anywhere near your house, because of Susie.'

'I'm not going to,' said Jack. 'I'm not quite so silly as that. I've chosen somewhere a long way away—down by the river. It's an old boat-house that nobody ever uses.'

This sounded exciting too. Peter wrote it down solemnly. 'Now we've heard everyone's idea except mine and Janet's. We went out hunting together, and Scamper came too—and we've all got the same idea.'

'What?' asked everyone.

'Well, it's a cave in the quarry near the field where we grow potatoes,' said Peter. 'So it's on my father's farm, and not very far. It's absolutely lonely and secret, and goes back into the hill behind the quarry. Scamper found it, actually.'

*That sounds good—a secret cave,' said Pam.

'Well, we'll now put all our ideas to the vote,' said Peter, and handed round slips of paper. 'Please write down on these papers what idea you like best— but nobody must vote for their own idea of course. I'll just go shortly over them again:

'Colin suggests a tree, but it's not a very secret place. Barbara suggests that old hut in the field near her house—but the roof's almost off and the rain would come in. Pam has no ideas. George suggests the caravan owned by his father's friend, a very good idea, but I don't honestly think we'd be allowed to use it because it's still furnished. I'd be afraid of breaking something.'

Peter paused for breath. 'Jack suggests the old boat-house by the river. Fine—but isn't it rather far away for a meeting-place? It's at least a mile away. And you know what Janet and I suggest—the cave. But that isn't a really comfortable place. There you are— please vote on your papers, for them in half, and give them to me.'

Everyone solemnly wrote something on their papers, then handed them to Peter. He opened them and read them. When he looked up, his eyes were shining with pleasure. 'Er—well—it's very funny, but everyone except me and Janet have voted for the cave. We couldn't vote for our own idea, of course. So it's five votes for the cave—and the cave it will be. I'm glad—it's a smashing place really!'

- click Aspirin: The Extraordinary Story of a Wonder Drug online
- read online Plum Island \(John Corey, Book 1\) book
- read *Grand Opera: The Story of the Met* here
- download Put Out More Flags

- <http://jaythebody.com/freebooks/An-Emperor-for-the-Legion--Videssos-Cycle--Book-2-.pdf>
- <http://test.markblaustein.com/library/Project-Orion--The-True-Story-of-the-Atomic-Spaceship.pdf>
- <http://thermco.pl/library/Grand-Opera--The-Story-of-the-Met.pdf>
- <http://korplast.gr/lib/The-Slumbering-Masses--Sleep--Medicine--and-Modern-American-Life.pdf>